Differences:

S&R	Landers	Description
		S&R's website does not have a location page on its homepage; a customer must log in with their personal information first to proceed in entering their exact location. On the other hand, Landers has a dedicated 'Enter Your Location' page on its homepage.
		Under the Apply for Membership page, each website has their own membership card design with different prices, colors, and perks, where customers can apply.

While both websites offer groceries and household items, they differ in terms of product selection and variety. S&R focus more on traditional bulk items and wholesale goods, catering to customers who prefer buying in large quantities. In contrast, Landers might emphasize a curated selection of premium and imported products, targeting customers interested in quality and uniqueness.

Overall assessment:

Based on the overall structures and design of the two websites, I personally prefer Landers' website because it is much easier to navigate and is more user-friendly compared to S&R's website. The layout of Landers' product listings, services, and promotions is very well-organized and appealing to the eyes, as well as the different product categories located on the left side of the website. S&R's website offers a simple navigation system, making it easy for users to find what they are looking for however, Landers users or members can browse a product or service even without logging in directly to the website, unlike S&R. Moreover, the pictures used on Landers' website are clearer, and the details are direct to the point when a certain product is clicked or viewed. Whereas, in S&R, the products and prices do not automatically pop up because they only show the categories, and the user may click several times on a certain item they are looking for.
